In FASHION now

Leather garments have been a fashion note for the past several fall and winter seasons. They will soar higher than ever into the fashion orbit during the coming seasons.

You will find it printed, draped, and decorated like fabric. It will be dyed exotic colors and combined with fabulous furs, tweeds, mohairs and silks to create designs suitable for any occasion you can think of.

Leather has been made into skirts, shirts, slacks, coats and evening ensembles. In many cases, you will hardly recognize it as leather. It will remain, however, essentially a casual material for the suburban or urban woman.

Bulky knits are being combined with leather in sleeves and collars attached to leather jerkins, full-length jumpers and zip up leather cover-alls for sportscar fans and the likes.

Another interesting combination you will find in the more expensive collections will be floor-length mohair skirts with bare suede tops for entertaining at home. You may want a pair of the new soft leather "cobblers" breeches to wear with a jeweled sweater for informal entertaining at home.

The care and cleaning of these leather garments is becoming less of a problem each year. There are a number of fine leather cleaners on the market. Some of the finer kidskins can be sponged off with soap and water, and even ironed when covered with a piece of tissue paper or dry cheesecloth.

KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

Are the northern lights visible brighter and brighter until one reaches the pole? Do they have a connection with our weather?

No, the northern lights seems to extend across the heavens south of the north pole by a good margin, and while they appear to the north, to most of us, they are seen from a different direction at the pole.

Science still does not have a complete explanation of these lights though it is thought that they are reflections from small particles in space. As far as is known, they have no effect on our weather.

However, they do sometimes cause electrical or electronic interference and man has not yet learned how to cancel out this communications handicap.

RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT CONCERNS AGRICULTURISTS

The effect of radioactive fallout has been claiming the attention of agricultural scientists over the country.

Some good news, some bad, is passed along by agriculturists at Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

For instance, according to U. S. Department of Agriculture research, it is possible to achieve 90 per cent or more decontamination of agricultural land from radioactive fallout by raking off mulch straw and removing sod, or scraping of surface soil.

On the other hand, removal of standing crops is largely ineffective.

Decontamination achieved by the scraping of bare soil to a depth of 2 to 3 inches ranges from 60 to 100 per cent, depending on whether the land was plowed, disked, or prepared as a seedbed. Soil prepared as a seedbed was more effectively decontaminated than the rougher soil surfaces.

Rolling cotaminated land or spraying it with asphalt had little effect on the removal of contamination.

Another test, conducted by a University of Tennessee - Atomic Energy Commission research team, has shown that milk can remain on the safe list as a calcium source, even if more radioactive fallouts occur.

Up to 94 per cent of radioactive strontium can be removed from milk. Strontium-90 is a by-product of an atomic explosion. It has a half-life of 28 years. It could threaten human life for a long time, because it may substitute for calcium, the main bone-builder. Too much radioactive strontium entering bone tissue may cause bone disease.

The Tennessee findings boil down to this: The dairy cow will remain an important source of calcium — especially for the young who are growing bone tissue rapidly—even if more and more radioactive particles contaminate air, water, soil, and plants. It was found that a cow will eliminate, by natural processes, most of the radioactive strontium she got from eating contaminated forage or pasture.

Researchers treated radioactive milk with an iron exchange resin similar to that used in cylinder - type home water softeners. The resin takes up strontium and releases calcium. It was possible to remove strontium up to 94 per cent in some tests.

The process is not yet ready for commercial use. However, should the need arise, researchers believe the basic process could be used by commercial dairies for removing radioactive strontium from milk.

F. C. C. Reaffirms Ruling

The Federal Communications Commission has refused to change its ruling that the "equal time" edict for political rivals applied to news programs as well as other broadcasts.

The White House repeated that President Eisenhower still believes that the situation presented by the ruling was "ridiculous."

Comment from the broadcasting networks indicated renewed calls on Congress to change the law.
